I heard a Fly buzz "when I died", by Emily Dickinson

Emily Dickinson's "I Heard a Fly Buzz When I Died" should be read, I think, with a particular setting in mind—a nineteenth-century deathbed scene. Before the age of powerful anodynes death was met in full consciousness, and the way of meeting it tended to be stereotyped. It was affected with a public interest and that pesky fly. But we don't see it yet. We just hear it "buzz." That's a great word to put in here, because it describes the noise a fly makes, but the sound of the word also imitates the sound of the fly. ! There must be whole people here, but all we hear about are "The Eyes." When a part of something is made to stand in for the whole thing.
